Pamela,

One of my fondest childhood memories is graduating from Dunbar High School here in Dayton.

But that memory was marred when I learned that I had the same textbooks in tenth grade that a fifth-grader had in private school.

I felt cheated.

The longer we go without an advocate for our public schools in Congress, the longer our children are being cheated.

Cheated out of an education that challenges them.

Cheated out of an opportunity that education gives them.

Cheated out of economic mobility that their education will provide them.

Here's the education reform I'm working for:

- We must cap student loan interest rates and providing more federal college grants to make sure a college education isn't a life debt sentence.
- If educating our children is one of the most important jobs, salary needs to reflect that. We need to pay our teachers more.
- We need to ensure the holistic support of our education system by offering more counselors and other wrap-around services.
- We must fight for a universal preschool program.

If we are going to ensure opportunity for all of our children, regardless of their race, their socioeconomic status, or their background—that starts right here with us.
